I. Reading: read the text and mark True or False at the end!

Consider the life of the unfortunate New York taxi driver. Outside in the streets of the city, there is an urban war going on, and if the cab driver is both to survive and to make money in the middle of all this he has to ensure he picks up neither the warriors nor the wounded.

Inside his cab, protected by all kinds of anti-mugging armour, he sits alone and ignored while life goes on in his back seat.

Ryan Weideman was a photographer in waiting, driving a New York cab to make a living but frustrated at not being able to pursue the career he wanted. He soon found a solution: turning his cab into a studio. At first he took photographs of just his passengers but then, as he became more confident, he started to include himself in the shots.

“Photography was a way of loosening up things. When I got in the photograph it was really like breaking down the partition in the cab. I could join in, people would invite me to the night club with them... a guy on his way to his wedding stopped off at the liquor store to buy me a bottle of champagne.”

Weideman, aged 48, drove cabs and took photographs for nine years, ever since coming to the big city from California. Occasionally, he would shoot before asking, but usually asked his customers, and very seldom did New Yorkers refuse to have their picture taken. The passengers didn't even get a free ride for their trouble.

Weideman is not driving cabs at the moment. Last year he was involved in a bad accident and is still recovering. He was not taking photographs at the time.
